Section 60 of the Equality Act 2010 makes it generally unlawful to ask questions about disability and health before you make a job offer. However Section 60 allows questions about health and disability to be asked before job applicants are offered the job only when the law says they are necessary and fall within these narrow exceptions:

1. To find out if a job applicant can take part in any assessment to test their ability to do the job or to find out if reasonable adjustments are needed to enable a disabled job applicant to take part in any assessment.
2. To find out whether a job applicant will be able to carry out an intrinsic part of the job. If this part of a job can be changed or assigned to another person then this may count as a reasonable adjustment for a disabled job applicant.
3. To find out whether a job applicant has a particular disability where having that disability is an occupational requirement of the job.
4. To monitor the diversity of people applying for the job.
5. To take positive action in relation to disabled people – for example, to decide if job applicants qualify for measures the employer takes to improve disabled people's employment rates.
6. Where another legal requirement means an employer has to ask health- or disability-related questions.
